

A number of Sufi brotherhoods were established during the late 1960s one Kurdish sect had members in nine Middle Eastern countries. One of the brotherhoods, which came into being in the thirteenth century, was that of the whirling dervishes (from the Iranian word meaning "poor"), mendicant ecstasies known for their gyrating dances performed while in a trance, a condition heightened by the gyrations. Dervishes and other Sufi orders maintain loose organizations and hold private meetings at which Iraman Jews form one of the oldest Jewish communities in the world, and through over 1,000 years of living among the carried on.
